What is a diagnostic service?

Your health care provider may order diagnostic tests for you for a variety of reasons, including personal or family history of illness, suspicion of a disease condition, or surveillance of ongoing problems. Diagnostic tests are an important part of supporting and maintaining your overall health.

Diagnostic services includes care you receive that:

- Treats an existing problem
- Diagnoses a new problem
- Monitors ongoing chronic problems for new or worsening symptoms
- Follow up to abnormal test results

The cost-sharing information provided below reflects your cost-sharing amounts when you seek care with in-network providers.

Diagnostic services and financial planning

Knowing whether the care you receive is diagnostic may help you budget for upcoming medical services or tests and help you avoid surprise bills.

Here are some common examples of diagnostic services you or someone in your family may have:

- Preventive care you receive that isn't part of the no-cost-to-you preventive benefit
- X-rays, ultrasounds, MRI, CT Scan, PET Scan (high-dollar imaging)
- Blood draws, biopsies and lab work, including genetic tests
- Strep tests, flu tests, and other types of illness-related tests
- Psychological and neuropsychological testing
- Fetal stress tests and amniocentesis
